STRIKING THE UNION BATTLE FLAGS

We publish in a special Washington dispatch to the Boston Journal of Tuesday the following remarkable announcement: Contrary to the strict orders issued on the subject, the battle flags of regiments have been vindicated today by an order from the War Department which directs the removal of the Union Order No 19 Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant General's Office, Series of 1877, requires the names of battles which regiments have been entitled to be placed on the Army Register shall be left until further orders.

We should like to know who ordered the Union Order and upon what grounds such a mark of honor should be stricken from the Army Register. For fifteen years the Army Register has been the only authentic record of the battles in which the National Flag and the National Flag alone, was borne. It was the only attempt made to place the records of the Union soldiers in the hands of the people, the only place of the people's all important work, with the exception of the records of the Rebellion. Who ordered the removal of the Union Order? Who is responsible for the act? Why is it practically buried by the act of the people? Why is the Congress through the proper legislation and Congress should attempt to obliterate or soil the public memorial of valor for which we have fought and bled?

BERTHA DANE.

"You could take it I think, Miss Dane?"

Bertha started, hardly believing her ears, or that the organist could be addressing herself. But he was motioning her to go forward, and she obeyed, a her color flushing her cheeks.

"Did you ever try it?" asked Mr. Mason, putting the sheet of music in her hand.

"Sometimes. With my Uncle Stephen."

Never another word spoke he. Beginning to play, Bertha found she had to sing at once with Miss Carpenter. Two, three times over did they try it. At first Bertha was timid, but she lost her self-consciousness in the delight the music brought her, she sang her best oblivious to all else; the old plaid shawl slipped off her shoulders, displaying her older dress; and she never once noticed that the eyes of the clergyman were again fixed upon her.

"That will do for now," said Mr. Mason to her. "You can return to your seat for the Invocation."

The rehersal over, the room soon cleared it-self. Bertha went out last, she never put herself forward before those well-dressed people who let her see that they looked down upon her. At the entrance door below she glanced up the street and down the street, thinking she might see her uncle, for he always came for her. But no, he was not to be seen.

"Neither Aunt Pen nor Sally can have got home," she thought, "and so he couldn't come out."

"Are you going home alone, Miss Dane?" asked Mr Mason, as he came forth with his circle of friends.

"Yes," she answered. In her eyes the man of music was a very great man, one, to be respected almost as a lord. "My uncle has to come to-long to-night. I shall soon be there."

She set off with a light, quick step. But had hardly left the street behind her and entered on the country when the energy in her began to lag.

"I will walk with you, if you will allow me, Miss Dane," he said. "I had your address in the same direction as mine."

"Oh, thank you," she returned, "think you very much. But indeed, I am not at all afraid; there's nothing to hurt me."

He seemed a very pleasant man, this clergyman, but quite old compared to Bertha, thirty-four at least, rather a tall man, with a good, friendly face. They chatted away on many subjects, chiefly on music, and Miss Carpenter's wonderful voice.

"Ay, she'll not stay at Crosdale long," he observed. "A voice like that must make its mark."

"You care fond of music, are you not?" asked Bertha.

"Very fond of it, indeed. But I cannot play nor sing."

"Oh, what a pity!"

"Do you think so?" he returned, smiling at her naive remark. "I can hear others, that is better than singing myself. It—oh, is this your home?"

For Bertha had stopped at the gate. He had let his hand out to wish her good night.

"I will walk a little farther, if you have been taken care of," he said.

"Uncle and aunt know that I live with them," interrupted Bertha. "Papa died a long while ago. He was a clergyman."

"A clergyman!" echoed the stranger, some surprise in his tone, as though he thought her poor attire was not much in accordance with what befitted a clergyman's daughter, at least, that was the conversation Bertha put upon it. "Name—Dane? Hewas not the Reverend Richard Dane, was he, curate of Allingham?"

"Yes, he was," said Bertha.

The stranger's answer was to take both her hands in his. "We are old friends," he said, with enthusiasm. "You don't remember me. I dare say, but I was once staying in your house, reading with your father. You were a pretty little child of five or six and I used to nurse you on my knee and call you Little Queen Bertha."

"I think—I do—remember," said Bertha, slowly. "But papa always had young men reading with him. Only one at a time, there was no room for more, as soon as one left another came."

"And he had, you say, Poor Dane! I have not heard of him of late years, but I thought he might have got a better living, or perhaps died."

"He died very six years ago, at Allingham, when I was fourteen. Master died not before him."

"Dear, dear! And you are living here! But I must not keep you any longer, Miss Dane. I hope you will allow me to call and see you, and to make acquaintance with your aunt and uncle. I shall never forget your father's kindness to me."

"Yes, I will come," answered Bertha in her lisping child way. "I am so glad to meet some one who can talk to me about papa and mamma. Nobody in all Crosdale knew them, except Aunt Penelope. Good-your-fe to go to-night."

"What time parts of a mile—up to Eden-lake? Good night."

Prudence rendered to reality is not fun; and having seen Bertha safely shown into her uncle's cottage, Mr. Mason, and just passed with the delightful new friend, Bertha, was recalled to earth by the high tones of her aunt's voice, evidently in hot dispute with Uncle Stephen.

"Fie, old hoodwink! he was saying a friend offered, if the girl would give up her nonsense of music and attend to her sewing and her housework, it would be better for all of us. Gallivanting out at night instead of darning the stockings, and leaving us at home to look after things! Here I find the lamp in a black smoke, every spark of it out in the house gone out, and no supper in your Cro dsdale! Fact, and all the result of the stuff! Where's the good of it?"

"You don't like music, Pelter-pie, and don't understand the good of it. It takes one right out of the world."

"Where's the use of that? demanded Aunt Pen. "You have come back to the world again."

Sometimes he did wish he could get out of the world altogether! Any place, out of the range of the sharp tongues. Bertha, taking the opportunity of a moment's lull, told eagerly of the great honor in store for her—that she was to sing duet with Miss Carpenter at the concert. It aroused Aunt Pen's wrath.

"What!" she cried. "Sing a duet in public, in the face and eyes of Crosdale! No, never. You are my own sister's child, and I'll never see you on the stage—disgracing the family!"

"On the stage! Oh, aunty!"

"What is bad as the stage," cried Aunt Pen. "Where's the difference?"

"But—but—so—an oratorio, aunt," said Bertha, impressively, the tears starting in her eyes. "And you know that ladies of the best families in Crosdale are to sing in it."

"I'd not give a penny to hear all the oratorios in the world," retorted Aunt Pen, slightly diverging from the subject, as it is in the habit of talkative ladies to do. "And, pray, where would you get a dress from to stand up and sing in? The clouds would not rain one down. No; you may just make up your mind to go to the society from to-night, and stay at home."

Bertha burst into tears. Uncle Stephen lighted his pipe meekly, and sat down to smoke it. Just then Sally was heard returning, and Aunt Pen called forth to find fault with her in the kitchen.

"Don't cry, child," said he. "She always says more than she means, you know, when things go wrong; and I did forget the fires and the lamp. It was that made her angry, the thought that it wouldn't have happened but for my letting you go out."

"But, Uncle Stephen, I'd not miss the oratorio for the world. We have been practicing for it so long."

"Oh, she'll let you go when the time comes. And she and I will go too—at least, I will. You will have two tickets given you as a member."

As Bertha dried her eyes, she began telling of the strange clergyman who had walked home with her—and of his having lived with them at home when she was a little child.

"What is his name?" asked Uncle Stephen, putting down his pipe for a minute in surprise.

"I don't know. I did not hear it, and forgot to ask it," replied Bertha. "He is so very, very nice, Uncle Stephen; it is such a good, pleasant face; and he seems already quite like an old friend."

"A clergyman?" debated Uncle Stephen. "Said he had to go to Little Crosdale? Bertha, I'd not be surprised if he is the new rector."

"Oh, uncle! But that's such a rich living—nine hundred a-year, they say. The rector of Little Crosdale would not be likely to notice me."

"I don't see what the living has to do with it," returned Uncle Stephen. "What was he like, this young man?"

"He has blue eyes, and the pleasantest smile and way with him you ever know," loudly replied Bertha.

"Is he tall or short, fat or thin, child?" asked Uncle Stephen, thinking her description a lame one. "A red face or a pale one?"

"He is rather tall and quite thin, uncle; and his face is pale."

"Then I think it is the new rector. His name's Brook."

"But why do you think it, uncle?"

"Yesterday morning, as I was standing at the fence in the meadow, talking to Clitterbuck on the other side of it, a clergyman passed down the road—a youngish man, a few years past thirty. 'That's Mr. Brook, the new parson at Little Crosdale,' said Clitterbuck to me, and we watched him out of sight. He was like what you describe him to be, Bertha."

"He said he should like to call here, Uncle Stephen. I hope Aunt Pen won't be put out if he does."

"There's no answering for that," said Uncle Stephen.
